

The one person -- yes, well I think of two of my students about the same time. Francis Schaeffer, who had tremendous energy and his heart was right on the matter of how can I get God's Word to people. He worked and worked on that line. Just worked his head off for years and very few people ever heard of him at all. Then all the sudden his testimony has gone out to the whole world. But it represents tremendous work before that on his part.

Then there is Douglas Young. He was greatly interested in exegesis, etc. at one time. But then he got greatly interested in the land of Israel and the geography of Palestine and all that which is very valuable. But his interested in Bible study I would say is minimal (today). His interest today is in affairs of the day, and how is Israel to continue. How is Prophecy now being fulfilled in Israel? He tried along <sup>one</sup> ~~this~~ line and didn't accomplish much. Along <sup>another</sup> ~~this~~ line and didn't. Along this line and didn't, <sup>etc.</sup> ~~this line and this line.~~ And then he got interested in this thing and for the last 20 years he has just worked his head off on it and done a real work. But I personally would have been happier if he'd given careful attention to careful study of the Word of God. He's greatly interested in it, <sup>and</sup> ~~but~~ -- he feels it's important but that's not what he's working at.

I was just thinking this morning of different people who have started with so much promise and the number that have really accomplished much. It's very disappointing.

The new movement that now is coming to the fore in a big circle of people that call themselves evangelicals is the post-millennial. They feel that we've just got to build a world in which the Gospel will be supreme and Christ will be honored from shore to shore. But some of them are more interested in attacking people who don't think
