

These questions you gave me are excellent questions; very good, very important. I'm not at all sure I can give definitive answers to any of them. But I have a good many ideas about each of them which perhaps may be worthwhile to get into general shape at least.

The first one you say this matter of conservative students deciding for one thing or another the best thing to do is to go to a liberal school. What are some of the reasons unwise to attend a liberal undergraduate school? Many who go for advanced training go to liberal schools, is this simply because no conservative ones are available?" "Is there value to be gained by the average student in liberal advanced training?"

Strange thing. It seems as though over and over you run into a conservative who wants to go to a liberal school so he's know how the other side thinks. I've never run into a liberal who wanted to go to a conservative school to learn how the other side thinks! They don't think we have any thinking worth paying any attention to. But the actual --- I think the fundamental reason is prestige. That the older schools, or the more wealthy schools have more prestige. A person has a desire to to have prestige that comes from well-known schools. That's probably the main reason. Then when one has learned of the danger, one begins to try to rationalize it that there is no danger-- after all my faith is strong enough; it certainly couldn't hurt me! The Scripture says: Let him that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall. (Not Ahab) Ahab said, Let him that putteth on his armour not boast ---- I got the source mixed but the truth is the same, that the person who is so sure his faith is strong is the very one who is in danger!
