

there and so on. I found a party that was going to Jerusalem and thought I would go with them, but it was near the end of the day and I was very tired, so when they made a stop at a hotel in Haifa I said, "I'd like to get off here leave you here and stay over night overnight"--which I did. The next morning I got a car to Jerusalem and saw had my first view of the land of the Bible as I went down over the fairly long trip from Haifa to Jerusalem.

In Jerusalem I was expected at the American School of Oriental Research. Dr. Albright was director of the school. There was a small library in the school, there were a dining room, and/rooms for the various for the students, along with a special apartment for the director and his family. I was greeted there by Baepler whom I had known in Jerusalem. (?) He was a member of the Missouri Lutheran church who had gone through Concordia Seminary and had taken some work at Johns Hopkins. There was ~~an~~ also a professor from San ~~Francisco~~ Francisco Presbyterian Seminary at San Anselmo with his wife and a son and daughter. He was the <sup>visiting</sup> annual/professor for the school that year. There was also the son of the president of ~~San~~ San Francisco Seminary, ~~Gurdon~~ Gurdon Oxtoby, and his wife. I had seen a good bit of them also in Berlin before they had gone to Palestine. So it was hardly like visiting going to a strange place. Dr. Albright received me very cordially. The Princeton Seminary had been one of the members of the American Schools and and of the supporting members, and had paid dues for quite a number of years, but Dr. Wilson, Dr. Allis and Dr. Machen were horrified at the fact that modernistic teaching was given at the school, and had had the seminary ~~to~~ withdraw from it. However, Dr. Albright said that Princeton had been a member so long, had paid so much, that he did not charge me tuition, which otherwise would have been quite a sum for the two months or so that I was there. Baepler and I were the two separate individuals in the group and so we chummed around a good bit there, although after a time he left. Then I spent such time, after he left, with a young Jewish fellow who had been offered a college education by his family but preferred to use the money to travel. Instead of going to college he visited museums all over the world, spending quite a bit of time in each, and studying antiquities extensively. He was a pleasant fellow, a rather bright fellow.
