

its efforts and right today you find that the Pope's special official for unification is a Jesuit, Cardinal Beahm. The last Pope had a Jesuit as his confessor. And the Jesuits are the head secret backbone of the Roman church and what they decide has more effect actually than the ideas of any Pope, at least that has been the situation in the last three centuries. But, it is interesting, that this man, Loyola, a warrior, organizer of a military company, setting about to plan how to advance the Roman church and how to push back the forces that were threatening to destroy it. That he and his associates should have decided that one of the greatest instrumentalities they could have established was an educational system, and the Jesuits established schools all over Europe which became known as the leading, the best schools of Europe. And Protestant Princes sent their sons to Jesuit schools because they could get a better education, and they came back indoctrinated. Some of them became strong Romanists, others remained nominal protestants, but they became indoctrinated. And the Jesuit schools became one of the great forces of not only the preservation of the Roman church, but the driving force of that counter reformation that drove back Protestantism until it occupied half as large an area in Europe as it had occupied in one time. That is as I say a negative illustration of the strong influence which education can have.

The second of that type which I would like to give is a much more recent one. It is America during these last fifty or sixty years. And during this period of time the intelligencia has been largely brain-washed through an influence in our colleges and schools of education to which practically all of our people who have secured higher education have been subjected. And I found what it was.

Forty years ago when I was a student in a Christian college, a