

find, because they weren't interested. I don't think you often found that, but there are the two sides in which some people have one ability, some the other. It's a rare person who's good in both of those areas. I know one man who is an outstanding man in the field of archaeology today, president of one of the finest organizations in that area, and I heard years ~~ago~~ ago, oh, he just can't get the languages. He works and works on the languages. I saw him again a few years ago, after not having seen him for many years, and I mentioned to him, I said, "Well, have~~you~~ you done work in languages?" "Oh, I've taken courses," he says, "in Aramaic, in Cuneiform, in Hieroglyphics, in all these, I've taken courses, and I've struggled, and I've gotten through," he ~~said~~ said, "But," he said, "my real area is in the area of the actual excavations and the ~~the~~ study of the material." Some have one ability; some have the other. We need, in all these different areas, to develop these values(?) that in which we are good. If you're good in study, and careful Bible study, fine. If you are good in dealing with other peoples's problems, if you're good in ~~reaching~~ reaching people, in winning people to particular aspects, stress the aspect in which you are good, but do not look with contempt upon the other aspects. Try to develop at least some ~~of these~~ ability in other aspects. We need to develop balance in all of these matters. And so,

g. is in emphasizing one aspect we should avoid giving a false impression. How easy that is to do. We all want to stress the thing in which we are good. We ~~feel~~ feel the importance of it, and it may be ~~extremely~~ tremendously important. The aspect of the Lord's service, the part of His work in which we have particular gifts, ~~we~~ we want to stress, and we should. But, oh how important it is to avoid giving the impression that that's all that matters. ~~Recognize~~ Recognize the value of those aspects of Christian work in which you yourself are not particularly gifted, and try to develop yourself to a certain extent in them, even though you put your major emphasis on ~~developing~~ developing those aspects in which you ~~yourself~~ yourself are gifted.

h. Understanding of this matter of balance/ an often prevent serious error.

Oh, there are so many different errors--in our lives, in our activities, that come ~~from~~ from our failing to recognize that a different quality, different types of work,
