say, "Let us see if the Scripture gives us an answer to this particular question." I think that is extremely vital as a factor in our approach to the general subject. Now, as we mentioned last time, there are two errors that we must be quite careful to avoid. One of this errors is the error of assuming that because two things follow each other in the Scripture they come immediately, one after the other, or even necessarily after each other. There is a certain presumption in that direction but there is a possibility that things are not presented in chronological order, or that there is a gap between two things which occur together. That we must always recognize in looking at any particular statement, that possibility and we must not say that we have absolute certainty on anything unless we have a specific statement of Scripture and not merely a fact that two things can be mentioned together or one of them succeeding the other. Then the other pitfall which we must very carefully avoid is the pitfall of the assuming that a Scriptural word or phrase is a technical term. I remember when there was a big argument twelve years ago between Prof. John Murray of Westminster Seminary and Dr. Buswell on the matter of the millennium. Dr. Buswell was then at Wheaton, and in the course of the discussion Professor Murray said that the word "end" always referred to one specific unit, which occurred right at the end of this age. That was "the end", and then Dr. Buswell pointed out many cases where the word "end" was used where it specifically could not refer to it and Prof. Murray replied, "Well these are the end of this or the end of that or the end of the other but when 'the end' is used without any such term following, then it must refer to that. It is a technical term for that," and then when Dr. Buswell pointed out one or two cases which quite clearly didn't refer to the end of this age, where "the end" was used, he said, "Well in that case 'the end' is not technically used. Well, it just shows the danger. We must not assume then that if a particular phrase--now there are people on the opposite extreme of interpretation from Prof. Murray who will say, "Whenever it says 'in that day', that
