rushed forward and seized those trenches and held the Germans back and you can imagine how exhilarating it would be after all that terrific gradual being pushed back and just holding your own, to be part of that great drive forward in victory, and the morning came when the big drive forward began and he and his comrades took their bayonets and started their big drive forward and they rushed forward and they hadn't been at it more than an hour or two when he felt as if a little flick of dust got into his eye. It didn't hurt him at all, just a little flick of dust, and then a few minutes later he noticed his vision was a little bit peculiar and he thought it a little strange and he got _____ and stepped over here to this Red Cross tent over at the side here a little way and just asked them to wash out his eye a little bit and they looked at his eye and they said, they wrote on a piece of paper and said, "Here, you go back to _____, and they shipped him back to another _____ to another _____ and they shipped him back/and they shipped him back, and by night he was on a boat on the way across the channel, back to Britain, and a few days later they took his eye out, and he didn't feel the wound hurting, a little tiny bit of a fragment of a shell had gotten in there, but it had ruined his eye, but how he had participated in this struggle of holding and holding and losing and losing and losing, and then when the great exhilaration of the victory began, which would have made up in the experience for all that was lost, he just had about an hour of it and then _____. I can imagine that that was just a little bit of the feeling that these people here had who were facing persecution and suffering for their faith and felt that their Lord was coming back and the tide was going to be turned and victory would soon be theirs and here were these people who wouldn't share in it, who were dying and losing out, and they sorrowed for them over that and Paul said "You don't need to sorrow for that over them, we which are alive will not take away any of the glory from these who die ahead of us. We will all equally share. Mr.---, did you have a question here? (Student) I don't
