

Him; you've never touched Him; you've never talked with Him." Night came and the two men retired to their beds. The next morning when they looked out from the tent they noticed footprints which had not been there the night before. The scientist said: "Someone must have passed by in the night." The Arab replied: "Did you see anybody?" "No." "Did you hear anybody?" "No. I slept right through." "Well, what makes you think that there was anybody here in the night?" The scientist answered: "Look at the foot prints." Just then the sun came up coloring ~~up~~ all the sky with lavender and purple. The Arab pointed to it and said, "Behold, the footprints of God!" The footprints of God are plainly visible in nature, if we but look for them. The Psalmist was right when he said: "The heavens declare the glory of God." (Ps. 19:1)

Suppose that two men came to a great railroad station, and saw trains coming in and going out, and all according to schedule. They observed the signs put up for a train, the people filling it, the train pulling out, and another soon coming in on the same track. Suppose one of them were to declare to the other that all this was pure accident! If he were serious, people would soon begin to question his sanity. ~~Any~~ ^{Any} one with any sense at all knows that someone must have established such an organization, and that someone must still be directing it.

A man walking through a mountain area observes three or four stones piled neatly one upon the other, in the form of a little tower. Twenty or thirty feet away he sees another similar pile of stones. A short distance beyond this second pile he finds a third, and so on, indicating a wavy line that extends for miles and guides him to his destination. Anyone who ever walked in the mountains is familiar with this type of trail markers. If you should tell him that their presence was purely accidental, he would surely laugh at you. He has not doubt that a human being has put these stones in this arrangement as a means of conveying directions. They show the activity of human beings. A mind has been at work.
