

nation == land being utterly wrecked with bombs, a third of their people brought under a foreign tyranny far worse than what they endured before Hitler came and the world regarded == regarding Germany as a poriah(?) among the nations. This may not be realized today because the communists determination for world conquest in the 1950's turned the world's attention away from the way they had felt about Germany in the previous decade and the nations decided it was necessary to allow Germany again to become == to be able to develop// a situation in which its people could live and in which their great energy and enterprise could be used to produce for the world instead of destroying the nation as was the desire of most of their opponents at Hitler's death.

Though Hitler was not particularly attractive physically he had unique power as an orator. Man looked on the outward appearance, not on truth, and did not see the falsehood underneath. He led the nation down a path that might have meant complete annihilation.

Just recently an American went to Europe and told the people that they should invest in his company which would give them some of the profits of great American prosperity. He organized several interrelated corporations which took money from Europeans and invested it in American securities. His fine talk led people to pour out their savings. Soon he was travelling from one nation of Europe to another with a large body of people accompanying him, his salesmen went out in all directions. The money poured in and from the money that he received he gave large dividends to those that had invested. It was a most attractive thing to the human eye.
