the church and would injure the work of the church and therefore by the removal of this woman from the earth, a good purpose was accomplished - the church was prevented from having a great scandal and having injury be done to it.   And therefore though the means was a bad means, the end was actually an end that was for the glory of God and therefore the sin which the man had committed was a sin which he must atone for, perhaps put a few candles before a statue of the Virgin or something, but it was not a great heinous sin because it had a good purpose and that purpose for the glory of the church. Well now that may be an extreme example but in the writings of the Jesuits and in the things which/are reputed on good authority to have done from time to time, there are evidences of many which would be-some wholly as bad as that and many of them nearly as badas that.   And in the course of the next two or three centuries they got a reputation in Europe for slyness and trickery in accomplishing their purpose and they became very much hated in many Roman Catholic countries and to this day there are many Roman Catholics and many members of other orders who greatly detest the Jesuits for their deeds and for their attitudes but their power is such that none dare go against them. There are others of course who greatly like them because they put great stress on developing a character and an attitude in their men which is very, very pleasant - they practically never engage in heated arguments or discussions - they are most kindly and friendly and helpful and they let others do that. And they'll bring the Inquisition against the others if the others don't do what they should.
It's a very cleverly worked out arrangement and of course the spiritual exercises and the whole training build up a great enthusiasm and emotional feeling that sees the   (4.5) is supreme and far ahead of anything else in the world and makes the men as a whole so utterly devoted to it that they are a most wonderful instrument for the accomplish-