

probably the bulk of the best ones would be Jesuit. That would be my guess, I haven't studied the statistics at all but they have many schools. Wherever you see a school with the name Loyola - it is a common name for a Roman Catholic school or the name Xavier, it's pretty apt to be a Jesuit school. Those were their two first great leaders - both of them were made saints by the church. Yes? (Question) It is very hard to say on that - I would rather doubt it. But I would say this. That it probably would not occur if it were not for the Jesuits. But whether they are taking any active part in it, I couldn't say. That is they are constantly watching for areas and situations where the church can be improved, its strength can be increased - I mean improved in the sense of its strength being increased - the number of adherents and the number of important people gained to it but that doesn't mean that they would themselves go into a particular situation but pass the word along to some official to suggest that some other order do it if they think it's something another order can just as well do. They go into the things that require the particular education and the particular skill that they have developed. In the next few years, in the next two or three centuries, many of them were spies in England and in other countries and it got to where in many of those countries it was dangerous to be dreamed that you were a Jesuit because they were implicated whenever there was something happened - a terrific upset to the government - it was suspected the Jesuits had something to do with it - which in many cases you can't prove whether they did or not but they were in enough things to get that reputation. But in a thing like this in the South? if there was nobody else that could do it, they would plunge into it. But there are two or three other orders of the church which have arisen in recent years which have taken a very definite purpose of reaching Protestants and are very interested in General Apologetics and in preaching to Protestants and trying to
